REVIEW OF "DISARMAMENT: WEAPON OF CONQUEST"

ANNOUNCER: AMERICA WAKE UP, in cooperation with the Daughters of the American Revolution, State of Illinois, presents Phyllis Schlafly:

MRS. SCHLAFLY: Do you think that the United States has no definite foreign policy and that our State Department is improvising foreign policy on a day-to-day basis? Do you think that our foreign policy can be summed up as a "no win" policy, as has been frequently charged? If this is what you think, you are in for a rude awakening when you open the pages of the newest book on our foreign policy called DISARMAMENT: WEAPON OF CONQUEST. The author, Robert Morris, shows that the United States has a very clear foreign policy -- only the American people are blissfully ignorant of what it is.

Mr. Morris, who has a long and distinguished career of service in the government, Congressional investigations, Naval Intelligence, and education, reveals that "for years, in the semi-official and official circles of Washington, we kept hearing what we discerned to be the outcroppings of an extraordinary policy." The first event which gave credence to these reports was the Fulbright Memorandum, revealed in 1961. This remarkable document said that Cuba and Laos were dangers -- not because they represented Soviet victories and the enslavement of more millions of people, but because they set in motion a desire in the American people "to hit the Communists with everything we've got."

The next event was the Rostow Report. Walt W. Rostow is the Chief Policy Planner of the United States State Department; he speaks with authority. In June 1962, one of the great reporters in the country, Willard Edwards, uncovered the existence of the Rostow Report and wrote two articles describing it and quoting from it. These two articles were immediately put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD because of the important news they contained, and their accuracy has never been denied. These two articles show that the Rostow Report is "a master plan for historic changes in U.S. foreign policy", built on the thesis that the Soviet Union is "mellowing", that we should not seek victory over Communism, that we should work for disarmament, and that the government should embark on a "systematic publicity campaign" to sell Congress and the American people on disarmament and a bold new foreign policy advocating conciliation of Russia.

Up until the publication of Mr. Morris's book, it was difficult for the average American citizen to find any information about the Rostow Report unless he happened to subscribe to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or to the few newspapers which carried Mr. Edwards' articles. The new book DISARMAMENT: WEAPON OF CONQUEST sets forth in full the two authoritative articles on the Rostow Report. A year has passed since these articles were originally published, and the unfolding events clearly prove their accuracy. The Rostow Report makes it clear why our Government does not raise a finger to help the Cuban exiles, but instead arrests the Cuban patriots who want to free Cuba. This is why the United States sent guns and planes to shoot down Tshombe's supporters in Katanga, why we forced the anti-Communists in Laos to go into a coalition government with the Communists, why the State Department issued a report on Hungary that reads like a product of Kadar's own propaganda machine, and why we lavish billions on the cruel dictators Tito, Gomulka and Sukarno.

The next event which revealed the thinking behind our foreign policy decisions was the official acceptance of disarmament as our national policy. The impetus for disarmament began when Khrushchev came to the United Nations in 1959 and proposed his strategem by which he hoped to fulfill his dream of world conquest, which he called disarmament. Mr. Morris shows how Khrushchev's offer was unanimously greeted by the American press with the skepticism it deserved. Yet, just a year later, Walt W. Rostow and Jerome Weisner went to Moscow and "returned amid rumblings about some kind of agreement on disarmament." Talks between the Soviet Union and the United States resulted in agreement on a set of eight principles on disarmament, which appear in the Report of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. For the convenience of readers who would not otherwise have access to this report, it is included in the book. Author Morris then comments as follows:

"Here was the transition from the Khrushchev demand of 1959 to our own policy of today. The world was generally scoffing at Khrushchev in 1959 when he proclaimed this goal. It should have known from past performances that this new strategem protended great changes, not in the Soviet Empire but here in the heartland of capitalism. The whole Soviet apparatus went to work on us."

This was followed, on September 25, 1961, by the publication of the little blue pamphlet known as State Department Document 7277, entitled "Freedom From War: the United States Program for General and Complete Disarmament in a Peaceful World." This is the official policy of the State Department, published by the U.S. Government Printing Office. It sets forth the plan to abolish our army, our navy, our air force, and our nuclear weapons in three stages, at the end of which time we would be subject to a "United Nations Peace Force."

Soon after Americans began discovering this policy of the State Department, the Government Printing Office said that State Department

Document 7277 is out of print. It is amazing that it has not been republished, as the Government Printing Office usually reprints pamphlets for which there is a heavy demand. For the last two years, it has been difficult for American citizens to get their hands on this document. Robert Morris has rendered a significant service in publishing this document in full in his new book DISARMAMENT: WEAPON FOR CONQUEST, and putting it into perspective so we can see that it is part of a pattern.

On April 18, 1962 the U.S. offered the Soviet Union a treaty to implement our Program for General and Complete Disarmament. This was during the period when Khrushchev moved his expeditionary force across the Atlantic to Cuba, but this did not deter our State Department planners who were convinced that the Soviet Union is "mellowing".

Again Robert Morris has included the text of the official document as revealed by the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, and which would be hard for the average American citizen to find. Included in this document is the following significant passage: "Disarmament would be accomplished in three stages -- the first to be carried out in 3 years; the second, also in 3 years; and the third, as promptly as possible within an agreed period of time. ... As national armaments were reduced, the United Nations would be progressively strengthened."

Here, Mr. Morris tells us, we see clearly revealed the amazing fact that the State Department's disarmament program is not disarmament at all, as that term is commonly understood! Disarmament takes place when all the nations of the world destroy their arms and effectively agree to arm no more. The State Department plan is to transfer military supremacy from the United States to the United Nations, which is something quite different. In a fine chapter entitled "What is Wrong with This Policy?" Robert Morris shows that this might be a thrilling concept IF the United Nations were made up of idealistic men and nations. But we have to face the fact that it is not. The Soviet Union has 12 votes out of 111 in the General Assembly and 2 of the 11 in the Security Council. Many other factors make the Soviet control much larger than this. There is a "whole string of left-leaning 'neutrals' who regularly vote with Khrushchev. Soviet espionage at the UN has repeatedly made headlines.

When our officials in Washington are asked about these shocking documents and programs, they cannot deny their existence. They seek to allay our fears by implying that they are only long-range goals, and perhaps they would never really be put into effect. In a short but excellent chapter entitled "It is For Real", Robert Morris shows what our officials have been saying for the record. William C. Foster, Director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, stated: "U.S. Disarmament proposals are, most emphatically, not intended for propaganda purposes. They are a sober statement of action policy. ... The problem is to gain support for these proposals and to negotiate the necessary details of them into specific agreements." Here is the statement made by Adlai Stevenson, U.S. Ambassador to the UN: "The United States program calls for the total elimination of national (military) capacity ... It is presented in dead earnest."

On June 10, 1963, the President of the United States made a commencement speech at American University in which he confirmed that our national policy is disarmament and the strengthening of the United Nations into a world government. His exact words were these: "Our primary long-range interest in Geneva ... is general and complete disarmament -- designed to take place by stages. ... Meanwhile, we seek to strengthen the United Nations, ... to develop it into a genuine world security system ..." In further implementation of the Rostow

Report which had called for the limitation of our first-strike weapons, the President said: "To secure these ends, America's weapons are non-provocative, carefully controlled, designed to deter and capable of selective use. Our military forces are committed to peace and undisciplined in self-restraint. Our diplomats are instructed to avoid unnecessary irritants and purely rhetorical hostility." Two days after this conciliatory talk, Khrushchev detonated two nuclear blasts. A week later, he followed with another nuclear blast and a speech in which he repeated his threat to "bury" us.

The last part of the book quotes news dispatches which prove how the State Department disarmament program is actually being put in effect at the present time, such as the abandonment of our 45 missile bases in Turkey and Italy, the halting of production in our bomber program, the cancellation of the Skybolt and the Nike-Zeus, and the nuclear test ban treaty signed last summer. When these news reports are placed side by side with news reports of the acceleration of Khrushchev's timetable for world conquest, the Cuban threat, and the recent new revelations of Soviet espionage, the situation is truly alarming.

Robert Morris concludes that our present policy is grounded in futility. Our efforts to appease the Soviet monster by disarmament and sweet talk only encouraged Khrushchev to move his Soviet missiles into Cuba and to step up his timetable for world conquest. "Thus, while we disarm, and reach into the sky for this fantastic merger with our dedicated enemy, committing ourselves to a minority position, Khrushchev pounds on to his self-appointed destiny...(he are failing to defend) our wonderful (American) heritage. Strength alone will save us. Substituting trust in Khrushchev for our own strength is a short-cut to destruction -- or, more likely, to nuclear blackmail."

Robert Morris has rendered a great service to Americans in breaking through today's news management to give us the facts and the authentic documents on DISARMAMENT: WEAPON OF CONQUEST.

ANNOUNCER: One of the principal national, state and community activities of the Daughters of the American Revolution is citizenship training of our youth. A nationwide contest open to girls in the senior classes of public high schools is held each year, and winners are chosen for their qualities of Dependability, Leadership, Service and Patriotism. The DAR presents a DAR Good Citizen Pin and a certificate to the Good Citizen chosen in each high school, a $100 United States Savings Bond and pin to each State Good Citizen, and last year presented the first National DAR Good Citizen Award. In most cases, the DAR Good Citizen is selected by a combined vote of the faculty and students. The state and national awards are given on a basis of patriotic essays. This program is one of the many DAR projects designed to train American girls to grown into useful and responsible citizens.

Listen in again next week at this same time for another in the series of programs called AMERICA WAKE UP.
